The U.S. elections are over—finally!—but the Bay Lake HOA is just beginning the process of electing a new director.

If you are a homeowner and are interested in becoming a member of the board of directors, the newly-appointed Nominating Committee is eager to talk with you. Please contact one of the following members.

2017 HOA memberships are available now. Association memberships may be purchased by residents who own their homes. You are considered an “owner” if your name is on the title to your home. Otherwise you are considered an occupant or, depending on your circumstances, a renter.

Any owner may purchase an annual membership for $10.00.

As an HOA “regular member” you may vote on all Association issues such as major purchases, amendments to bylaws, and approval of charitable contributions. However, under Florida law only one vote per home may be cast in HOA elections. For example, if you and your spouse are both owners of your home and you both are HOA regular members, each year you must decide which of you will fill out and submit the ballot for election of officers.

An occupant or renter who wishes to show support for the HOA may become an “associate member.” Associate members are not eligible to vote on any issues. Associate memberships also are $10.00 annually.

AN IMPROVED TECH SUPPORT SCAM
by Steve Rollison

Previously I’ve reported that a favorite hobby of mine is toying with scammers who call and claim to be from some “tech support” department. It’s devious, wicked fun to see how long I can keep them on the line until they get totally frustrated and hang up.

Several weeks ago I got a call from “HP tech support” because my computer supposedly had been automatically reporting to them that it was infected with viruses. They wanted me to give them remote access to my computer so they could “confirm there’s a problem.” That’s their standard spiel. Here’s how the next few minutes of the call went.

Me: “That doesn’t sound good. Which computer reported there’s a problem?”
Fake HP: “It’s your HP ENVY 15 TS Notebook.”

I was surprised that not only did they have my cell phone number, but they also knew the model of the computer I use most often. I decided to call their bluff and ask them for information that only Hewlett-Packard would have.

Me: “Shoot! I have two of those—one for work and one for home. (A lie, but they wouldn’t know that.) What’s the serial number of the one that’s infected?”

Previous I’ve reported that a favorite hobby of mine is toying with scammers who call and claim to be from some “tech support” department. It’s devious, wicked fun to see how long I can keep them on the line until they get totally frustrated and hang up.

Several weeks ago I got a call from “HP tech support” because my computer supposedly had been automatically reporting to them that it was infected with viruses. They wanted me to give them remote access to my computer so they could “confirm there’s a problem.” That’s their standard spiel. Here’s how the next few minutes of the call went.

Me: “That doesn’t sound good. Which computer reported there’s a problem?”
Fake HP: “It’s your HP ENVY 15 TS Notebook.”

I was surprised that not only did they have my cell phone number, but they also knew the model of the computer I use most often. I decided to call their bluff and ask them for information that only Hewlett-Packard would have.

Me: “Shoot! I have two of those—one for work and one for home. (A lie, but they wouldn’t know that.) What’s the serial number of the one that’s infected?”
Fake HP: “It’s number 5CF345490AD.”

Now I’m the one who’s flustered! Firstly, I wasn’t expecting any kind of answer, and secondly, I have no idea what the serial number of my computer really is.

So my response was “Okay, I’ll check it out and call you back,” then hung up. That response made no sense because I didn’t have his phone number, so I expected him to call back a little while later. Surprisingly, he never did call back.

I grabbed a flashlight and read the serial number off the back of the case. “5CF345490AD.” He had it right!

How did he get my serial number? Had somebody hacked into my system to get it? I fired up three different advanced utilities to search my computer for the serial number. I could find lots of private information like the serial number of my Windows 10 license, but I could not find the serial number of my computer embedded anywhere. It’s unlikely anybody got my serial number through hacking.

So the question remains: how did this scammer get my phone number, my computer model, and my computer serial number? (I don’t remember if he had my name or not.) The only time I remember giving anyone my serial number was when I registered the purchase of my computer for its extended warranty.

It is certainly possible that the warranty company has been hacked and all their customer records compromised. It is widely rumored that exactly that happened at Dell Computers, with thousands of Dell customers subsequently getting phone calls from scammers with computer-specific information. (Dell has never directly denied or confirmed the rumors.)

So here’s the lesson to be learned…

No matter how legitimate it seems, if you receive a phone call from “tech support” – Microsoft, HP, Dell or any other company – you can be 99.999% certain that it is a scam. Some of these scammers are very professional, very convincing. Do not talk to them. Do not answer a single question. Do not even say “No thank you.” Do not even say “I know this is a scam. Do not call me again.”

There is only one correct response to a phone call from “tech support.” Hang up immediately.

If you ignore this advice the least of your worries will be the $250 or more that you will be scammed out of. You may also have all personal and financial information on your computer 100% compromised. If during the phone call you finally realize you are being scammed and confront the technician accessing your computer, within seconds he can lock up your system so that it will be impossible to access anything it contains.

These are not “could happen” scenarios. They are results that real people have actually fallen victim to. There is only one correct response to a phone call from “tech support.” Hang up immediately.
